"As far as I'm concerned there is only one Miami Beach show. Every facet of the operation is handled in a professional manner and is dedicated to the dealers' needs and concerns. The show allows dealers to conduct business with peace of mind," said Nina Som with Tri-State Antiques, which showcases primarily 18th & 19th Century European decorative and fine arts. "The show has afforded me a chance to develop relationships with collectors and dealers from all over the world, all year long. I could never have met them without the show!"

Harvey Kessler, owner of Harvey Kessler Jewellery in Toronto, Ontario, said, "We have been exhibiting at the Original Miami Beach Antique Show for more than 15 years and develop new relationships with collectors and dealers each year. This show is the most important estate and antique jewelry show in the Americas. We do more business at the Original Miami Beach Antique Show than any other."

Nan Summerfield, owner of Summerfield's in Beverly Hills, said, "In this tight economy, beautiful jewelry is coming onto the market that we haven't seen in several years. This is a great time for people to invest in tangible assets at good prices."

"We've been exhibiting at the Original Miami Beach Antique Show for more than 10 years because this is the only show that affords us the best buying and selling opportunities with other retailers and consumers," said Albert Levy, owner of A.B. Levy Antiques in Palm Beach, Fla. "What is most interesting is the vast array of clientele and price ranges of items available for purchase. For example, we will be featuring a Monumental Galle 'Wisteria' Lamp from the early 1900's."
